Talk By Bronx Community College Aims to Redefine American Greatness

By SÍLE MOLONEY

Nestled in the back of Bronx Community College (BCC) campus on one of the highest points in the borough with spectacular views of the city is a little-known secret fortress.

Since 1907, a semi-circular enclave of solid bronze busts depicting various American historical figures from the world of politics, the arts, science, and others line a classical-style stone-arched colonnade, presiding majestically over the bustling University Heights neighborhood and Harlem River.

The secluded area, known as the Hall of Fame for Great Americans, designed by American architect Stanford White, was the first of its kind in the country when it was built, but like other public places it has not been free from controversy.

There are few women represented, for starters. And in 2017, the busts of overtly controversial historical figures such as confederate generals Robert E. Lee and Stonewall Jackson, were removed two years ago as part of a national trend that condemned the history of the Confederacy in the United States, which came to the forefront in the aftermath of the 2015 fatal church shooting in Charleston, South Carolina and the fatal car attack at the Unite the Right rally in Charlottesville, Virginia. Critics say confederate statues symbolize and glorify white supremacy.

In light of the controversial nature of the topic and the tragedies which have ensued, Bronx Community College is hosting a month-long exhibition from Sept. 21 through Oct. 25 entitled Diversity in Public Art: Empowering Community Voices at the Hall of Fame. The aim is to open the discussion among staff, Bronx residents, faculty, students and the wider public as to what constitutes American greatness and who gets to be inducted into the Hall of Fame.

Cynthia Tobar, Head of Archives at BCC, explained that, historically, candidates considered for inclusion in the Hall of Fame had to have been U.S. citizens by birth or through naturalization and had to have died at least 25 years before their nomination.

Historically, elections were held every five years between 1907 and 1970 and were conducted by a committee of prominent representatives from the 50 states. The most recent bust installed there was that of Franklin Roosevelt in 1992, but in the early 1990s such public monuments were used to document the notoriety and accomplishments of military heroes.

“This school had been designed with that student body in mind - basically very white, very male-centric,” said Tobar. The college was originally owned by NYU, but was sold to BCC in 1973 when NYU was undergoing financial difficulties.

“We want to celebrate American greatness,” said Tobar. “And now, even the term - and people arguing and debating about what is it to be an American - how do we reframe that? How do we disrupt those structures and come from a place of inclusivity to broaden that definition?”

The exhibition will consist of paintings, sculptures, films, digital art, and various mixed media, while the exhibit seeks to re-examine the Hall of Fame and ultimately address the importance of cultural diversity in public monuments.

It is timely and appropriate such event is hosted by BCC given nearly 100 percent of the student body hail from ethnic minorities and over one half, 55 percent are first-generation students. The majority come from the Bronx.

I don’t know, but I always thought it was a waste of time. Users of tobacco don’t need to smoke less, they need to quit. No smoking at all. Never liked it and always thought smoking anything was bad. Man-made vapes? At least if it’s a cigarette, I would think there would be less chemicals. I think vapes are the worst. I think they just wanted to make the money … they don’t actually care about who’s going to get hurt.
Elainer Marmolejos

I believe it’s another way for our government, the tobacco companies, to regain control of something they lost. Basically, the tobacco companies have lost millions of dollars by people switching over to vaping. I did a little research myself. Over in Europe they have been vaping for years. Using different flavors with the same kind of technique with three milligrams or six milligrams of nicotine. They never have had a problem. Now, all of a sudden people are dropping dead. It started with the Blue Pen, but now it’s tricking down to the vapes with the flavors. [It] has nothing to do with flavors.
Antonio Sanders

I feel like e-cigarettes are horrible because of the way it’s accessible to the youth; it’s a bit scary. I also feel the flavoring in them entices children. That’s why there’s so many of the younger generation picking them up. They also don’t smell like tobacco; it doesn’t leave a stain on your fingers. Because they don’t smell like tobacco, the parents will never find out. Because it comes in strawberry and other flavors, they are targeting this generation. The fact that it’s killing people is why they are taking it out. If it was just killing black and brown people it wouldn’t be an issue, but because it’s affecting a lot more people, I feel that’s why they’re taking it off the shelves.
Kelli Crosby

They say vaping cigarettes are better for your health, but it’s not. It’s bad for your health. They didn’t experiment with it enough. They just put it out there and started to give it flavor. Now they got the young kids out here, puffin’, puffin’ like they’re crazy. The bubble gum flavor, the grape and they’re doing that with the pipes too. They should take all of it off the market. If they are going to put it out, they need to experiment first, test it to see if it’s safe for the public. Why put something out that’s poison?

Hailing Lehman Center’s $15 Million Facelift, a Striking Arts Venue

By DAVID CRUZ

Call this a glass act.

The newly-minted Lehman Center for the Performing Arts was celebrated with a ribbon-cutting that hailed the completion of the boxy, glass-exterior concert hall. The timing of the occasion came at the eve of the center’s 40th concert season debut.

Dubbed the borough’s Lincoln Center, the $15.4 million redesign of the three-story venue adds another 5500 square feet of space that went towards a new lobby and rest rooms. Guests couldn’t help but look up, admiring the grandiose look of the hall that was built in 1980.

The building’s prior state was somewhat obsolete since it was not compliant with the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), keeping the disabled from enjoying the myriad of acts offered each season. The building is now equipped with walkway ramps and an elevator to the balcony.

“We had to do this construction because we had to make the building ADA compliant. Our architect took it beyond that,” said Eva Bornstein, the center’s long-serving executive director. “He went beyond his duties to make it really special.”

The expanded site earned an endorsement from Bronx Borough President Ruben Diaz Jr., an alum of Lehman College, where the center is located.

“If you’re from the Boogie Down Bronx, you know that part of our flavor—if there’s one, if not the first major ingredient that’s part of our DNA, a major component—is music,” said Diaz Jr. in his remarks before breaking into hip hop song.

Diaz Jr. allocated $500,000 toward the project, with the Governor’s Office, and city and state legislators representing the Bronx cobbling the rest of the funds needed for the project. Talk of a major overhaul goes back to 2003, the year Bornstein started as the executive director, but was put on hold until all funds were secured. Renovations began in 2017. Monies for the project also went to refurbish the venue’s existing amenities including the 2,278-seat auditorium.

The center’s completion comes amid other gargantuan projects slated for Lehman College, including extensive renovations for the institution’s Leonard Lief Library and a new $75 million, 53,000-square-foot nursing training center. The college’s president, Daniel Lemons, saw the upgrades aligned with the borough’s moment of “significant renewal.”

The center represents one of few concert halls in the Bronx, which attracts musical acts from around the world. It’s also drawn familiar headliners that are not from the music world, including comedian Jerry Seinfeld.

This year, the center attracted Thai Express from India’s Bollywood scene, R&B singer Stephanie Mills, and famed salsa star Eddie Palmieri to mark its four-decade milestone.

Finding the center proved tough for folks, which may be eased now that its namesake is emblazoned on the building’s glass enclosure. This may likely ease the frequent question Bornstein’s heard from patrons heading to the center over the years: where is Lehman Center?

“I had to tell them, ‘just follow me,’” said Bornstein. “Now I don’t have to escort them because, I mean, how can you miss it? You can’t miss it.”

Inside a busy convenience store in Norwood stood a gold mine that someone’s ready to collect.

And while it’s still unclear who won the $10.7 million lottery prize at TS Stationery at 3401 Jerome Ave., one thing’s certain: the winner’s a store regular.

News of the jackpot winner on Sept. 9 caused quite the buzz at the store that falls within the Jerome Gun Hill Business Improvement District, one of the few stores within the strip where customers can play the lottery. It’s there where Ms. Lee, the owner, worked the lotto machine on Sept. 13. An employee with the New York State Gaming Commission was also on hand to give Lee a promotional sign boasting about the gigantic prize.

Ms. Lee, who’s owned the store for the last 20 years, said she wasn’t around when the winning numbers were punched. But Mohammed Tuhi, a four-year employee at the store, was. He didn’t know the winner’s name, but knows he’s stopped by several times. Help from the store’s surveillance cameras may be able to ID the customer, said Tuhi. The last notable winner occurred last December where one customer won $100,000. That customer remains a regular, according to Tuhi.

Plenty of customers had lots of ideas for what should be done with that recent windfall. Irizarry Jose, a customer waiting to put in his numbers, said he would “get as far away from New York City as possible.” “I get a place to live—a house, a boat—and just stay over there for the rest of my days,” said Jose, 63.

As a means of concealing their identity, one person said the winner would “hire a lawyer, create a limited liability partnership and no one knows who won.”

That may not be so easy since New York State still mandates winners go public. The matter to bar the identities from coming forward was brought before the State Legislature last year, but vetoed by Gov. Andrew Cuomo, arguing the the practice indicates to the public that the state hasn’t siphoned any jackpots.

Steven Ortiz, a Norwood resident, had other plans. “I think the first thing that I would probably do is find a new place to live, find a temporary rental or something like that, maybe close my social media accounts,” said Ortiz, who doesn’t mind sharing some of it. “If anything, it shows that it’s real. Sometimes I don’t know anybody who won a super big prize like that.”

Another customer, who went by Ms. Stokes, said the person who won “probably left town.”

It’s unclear whether the New York State Gaming Commission will host a celebration for the store and winner.

THE $10.7 MILLION jackpot was drawn on Sept. 9, though TS Stationery didn’t know there was a winner until Sept. 11.

Stop Work Orders Issued at 2 of 4 New Norwood Projects

A little girl is miraculously alive after her father jumped onto the tracks of the Kingsbridge Road #4 train station, taking her with him before getting himself killed by an oncoming train.

The scene unfolded at around 8 a.m. on Sept. 23 when the five-year-old and her father, identified as 45-year-old Fernando Balbuena-Flores, were on the platform. Minutes later, after getting off his cell phone, he jumps to the tracks, picking up his daughter identified as Ferni Balbuena and taking her with him as a train pulls into the station.

The man is hit while his daughter gets pinned underneath the train. Video captured from a cell phone shows two bystanders jumping on to the tracks, convincing Ferni to crawl out from beneath the train car before she’s pulled out to safety and handed up to waiting hands on the platform.

Amazingly, she is able to walk on the platform virtually unscathed. Balbuena-Flores died instantly underneath the train. The child was taken to Jacobi Medical Center and treated for minor injuries. The two bystanders who pulled her up were taken to St. Barnabas Hospital where they were treated for minor injuries and released.

It’s unclear why the dad jumped. “I heard him telling the wife that you look out for the other two kids. I’m going to take her to school and then he said ‘I love you,’” said Pamela Ivy, an eyewitness, telling television reporters at the scene. “The train just hit both of them. They didn’t have time to move because the train was coming so quick. The train just ran both of them over.”

Niurka Caraballo, Ferni’s mother, rushed from her home on the Grand Concourse in Fordham to the subway station following her conversation with Balbuena-Flores. She sensed something was off, but by the time she arrived, Balbuena-Flores had already jumped to his death.

The news caught the attention of Councilman Fernando Cabrera, whose council district covers Kingsbridge, who tied the suicide with high rates of suicide. “Today’s incident and many others pinpoint the need for a dramatic increase in the availability of mental health treatment. Accompanying any increase in treatment, society must also eliminate the stigma, which is often associated with mental illness,” said Cabrera in a statement.

Ferni was released from the hospital hours after the incident and was met with photographers and reporters outside her apartment building. A relative soon ushered her inside. Caraballo, severely distraught, later came outside her building, telling reporters that her daughter’s in “perfect condition.” “Thanks to God and the angels that protected her,” said Caraballo.

Pop-up Storytime in Norwood Looks to Boost Literacy Rates

By SHA-NIA ALSTON

Olga Baez is so worried over the Bronx’s low literacy rates it compelled her to improve them. And she called on her local cell phone store for help.

“I know that the literacy rates in the Bronx are very low, so I wanted to start within my community a local storytime activity. Because I know the local library has a storytime, but they do it for toddlers; there’s no reason that kids that are a little bit older cannot enjoy storytime, especially elementary-age kids,” Baez said in a phone interview with the Norwood News.

Illiteracy rates in the Bronx stand somewhere between 24 to 28 percent, according to the latest findings.

Baez, through her nonprofit dubbed StriveHigher, partnered with the T-Mobile store on 306 E. 204th St. in Norwood to host monthly book readings. The store manager provides Baez with a section in the store for readings, going so far as to occasionally pay for the snacks.

StriveHigher is a non-profit that focuses on turning children into well-rounded individuals through financial literacy, education, career exploration, and wellness. Baez makes the readings interactive with different subjects that range from swimming, back to school, to the concept of self-love.

For Baez, those activities are meaningful since she wants children see themselves in books. During “meet the author” events she collaborated with local authors of color as a way of creating a connection between the authors and children of color.

This month’s upcoming storytime on Sept. 28 focuses on author Militeri Tucker Concepcion and guest reader Dr. Janira Vega, a pediatric psychologist at Montefiore Health System. Dr. Vega will speak on her path to becoming a pediatric psychologist.

“I think that I have been able to build a storytime community. A lot of our kids and parents are returners so they come back every month and it has become part of their activities they do on Saturday,” Baez said.

Editor’s Note: Parents can RSVP to this month’s book reading at the T-Mobile store at the corner of East 204th Street and Perry Avenue from 11:30 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. by emailing StriveHigherNY@gmail.com or texting (347)-974-1105 including your child’s name and age.

Norwood Smoke Shop Adjusts in Wake of E-Cigarette Ban

By JONATHAN CUSTODIO

Smoke shops across the state are pulling flavored e-cigarettes off their store shelves after Gov. Andrew Cuomo announced an emergency ban of vaping products, considered to be heavily targeted towards youth.

A Norwood smoke shop on the corner of Bainbridge Avenue and East 207th Street is breathing easy on this. Mo, who works there, says that e-cigarettes don’t make up a large percentage of the store’s revenue. Among those is Juul, a vaping product he says sells.

“Juul is one section that sells. I sell other stuff. It’s a big loss but it’s not really gonna close me,” notes Mo.

Juul is the leading e-cigarette manufacturer and customers only need to buy the vaping pen and refill it with a variety of cartridges. One Juul pod can contain as much nicotine as an entire pack of cigarettes. One Juul pod can contain as much nicotine as an entire pack of cigarettes. One Juul pod can contain as much nicotine as an entire pack of cigarettes.

The ban, voted in favor by the state Public Health and Health Planning Council, went into effect on Sept. 15 and will be reviewed every 90 days before renewal.

In 2018, 27 percent of high schoolers were active vapers, according to the state Department of Health. The state’s legal age to buy tobacco is 21 years old. Mo says he’s had to deny the product to customers under the age limit. Meantime, the city Health Department reports 1 in 15 middle school students and 1 in 6 high school students are actively vaping.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) reported that 530 confirmed or probable cases of lung disease associated with e-cigarettes had been identified in 38 states and the U.S. Virgin Islands, with nine confirmed deaths. Some of the deaths are linked to users putting marijuana vaping oils into vaping products. Marijuana contains tetrahydrocannabinol (THC), the active psychoactive ingredient in marijuana.

Dr. Juan Tapia Mendoza, a pediatrician who works with Mount Sinai Hospital and Montefiore Health System, among others in the city, says that though there is still more research to be done, vaping products are harmful largely because they contain nicotine, vitamin E acetate and other additives. “The speculation is that the oil of the vitamin E acetate creates a severe chemical reaction deep inside the lungs which prevents oxygen exchange between the lungs and circulation,” says Dr. Mendoza, who has 20 years’ experience.

Unlike other products containing nicotine, e-cigarettes and other vaping products are not regulated by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA).

Dr. Mendoza, who also works with SOMOS, a health network that caters mostly to the immigrant community, notes that many of his vaping patients consider the practice to be safe and non-addictive. Roughly 25 percent of his patients have the chronic disease of pulmonary function, which can become so severe that replacing a damaged lung with an artificial lung is inevitable.

Stores that sell flavored e-cigarettes have until the end of this month to remove the banned product from shelves.

In a statement offered to the press, Juul emphasized its products do not “include THC, any compound derived from cannabis-related products, or vitamin E compounds like those found in cannabis-related products. We appreciate the work of the CDC, FDA, and other public health authorities, and are confident that they will get to the bottom of this issue.”

The World is Getting Hotter. Tell Your Legislators to Reverse Course

Climate change—the concept that our world is getting so hot through global warming that it’s having an enormous impact on everything from rising sea levels to sweltering summer months—has zipped to the list of real pressing concerns.

The Norwood News doesn’t want to necessarily lecture you on the devastating effects rising emissions such as carbon dioxide—one of the leading culprits behind climate change (along with methane and nitrous oxide), which is found in the gas you pour into your car—but it will.

And rather than turn this into an ideological fight over whether left-leaning progressives are inflating the problem or right-leaning conservatives are simply looking the other way, we turned to NASA to give us a sense of the problem. Here goes:

NASA has been monitoring the effects of climate change for some time, compiling their findings in an easy-to-understand website called “Global Climate Change: Vital Signs of the Planet,” breaking down evidence that the world is heating up largely from the fact that more carbon dioxide is being released to the sky. The heavy use of elements like carbon dioxide-producing coal, typically used to power electric plants that supply power to homes, has now caused some of the coldest places in the world to melt. The same can be said of cars that produce carbon dioxide caused by the fuel that’s put into them. That melted water, of course, has to go somewhere. It’s trickling into the ocean.

And oceans have absorbed much of that hotter air, which has shown to produce some of the fiercest hurricanes we’ve seen. Wind speed is driven by how warm the ocean is, so the hotter the earth, the faster a hurricane could be. Hurricanes also carry a lot more rain water. So between the wind speed, more rainwater, and a greater storm surge caused by rising sea levels, hurricanes will likely kill more people in its path.

With carbon dioxide derived from energy-producing elements like fossil fuels and coal, the logical problem is to scale back. If someone is sick, and they realize it’s because they’re smoking cigarettes or eating junk food at an alarming rate, then the next logical step, for their sake, would be to cut back, right? The same premise holds for reversing climate change.

New York City has attempted to turn things around, introducing a food scrap program to reduce the amount of methane-producing foods in the city’s landfills. Its most ambitious initiative dubbed the New York City Green New Deal mandates buildings with 25,000 or more square feet of space retrofit energy-efficient windows and insulation so that the requisite heat/cold air can be trapped more.

Climate change, unfortunately, can’t be solved just by one person making small lifestyle changes (i.e. driving less, using electricity). There’s wishful thinking in believing humans will change their daily conveniences for the greater good. It takes a major overhaul, and screaming into a microphone demanding it is just one step in reversing climate change.

It’s incumbent upon diplomats from around the world to convince world leaders to adopt policies and inspire innovation through massive tax credits that reverses climate change. This can include private-public partnerships that develop technology free of the elements that can kill you.

There’s work on this already under way, but until fossil fuels become the new alternative source of energy, the work will have to continue.

And since it’s highly rare for the general public to get hold of our diplomats, it’s incumbent on Representatives Adriano Espaillat, Eliot Engel, Jose Serrano, and Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez to get the word out to them.

Climate change is inescapable no matter what part of the world you travel, and our diplomats are perhaps our biggest advocates to countries such as China, India, Russia, and Germany. Otherwise the devastation will continue, and the threat will be inherited by the young.

Letters To The Editor

Gambling In My Establishment?
I laughed hard when I read the comments of the lady, Ms. Sheila Sanchez, who walked by Whalen Park and was shocked to see men drinking tequila at noon time (Norwood News Sept. 12-25, 2019). It reminded me of the scene from the classic movie “Casablanca” with Rick.

Rick: How can you close me up? On what grounds?
Inspector Renault: I’m shocked, shocked to find that gambling is going on in here!
[a croupier hands Renault a pile of money]
Croupier: Your winnings, sir.
Inspector Renault: Oh, thank you very much.

This classic scene from “Casablanca” perfectly describes this hypocrisy of politicians and neighborhood residents who feign blindness of what is standing directly in front of their eyes. It’s the Democratic party and their socialist leanings.

We won the City back during Mayor Rudy Guiliani’s zero tolerance policy to quality of life offenses. People went to jail for urinating in public, jumping turnstiles, smoking on buses, drinking alcohol in public and our neighborhood and our lives improved. Now the Corey Johnson-, AOC- and Melissa Mark-Viverito-types ended those criminal sanctions and look at the results. Please let Ms. Sanchez know who saw what she saw in Whalen Park, that was mild compared to what is coming down the road with these socialist Democrats, and don’t appear to be shocked like Inspector Renault in “Casablanca.”

Backg Gabbard
Edgar Cisneros (Letters to the Editor in the Sept. 12-25, 2019 issue) thinks Andrew Yang would be a good president because he wants to give every adult American $1,000 a month. Really? Would this include Jeff Bezos and Bill Gates?

Robert Press (July 4-17, 2019 Inquiring Photographer) thinks a ticket of Rep. Kamala Harris and Mayor Bill de Blasio would be good. As a prosecutor, Harris tried to keep an innocent man in prison on a legal technicality, tried to suppress DNA evidence in the case of a man on death row, defended false confessions, perjury and withholding evidence. She also argued for keeping inmates in overcrowded prisons by saying the state needed their labor.

De Blasio claims to be a progressive. But his record of giving labor contracts that don’t keep up with inflation and accelerating the decline of public housing and inner city public schools proves that claim to be a lie.

Iraq war veteran, military reservist and U.S. Representative from Hawaii Tulsi Gabbard is the best candidate. Her domestic views are similar to U.S. Senator Bernie Sanders. But she’s the only candidate strongly opposing interventionist U.S. foreign policy.

She’s the one who pointed out that Syrian leader Bashar Assad is not our enemy. Most of the U.S.-supported rebels, which include Al-Qaeda and ISIS, are. She’s the one who spoke against U.S. attempts to overthrow the Venezuelan government. She’s the only one who, during a Democratic debate, called out Harris on her record as a prosecutor. That, like Gabbard in general, was ignored by the mainstream media.

The Democratic National Committee (DNC) has bumped her from the next debate by claiming she has not reached the two percent support level in four “certified” polls. They don’t consider most of the 26 polls that have her at that level to be “certified.”

So the same mainstream media and DNC that rigged the 2016 campaign to favor the horrific Hillary Clinton are at it again. The last thing they want is a president whose economic policies would help most people and who would refuse to get people killed in wars the U.S. should not fight.

Manhattan Councilman Latest Challenger in Crowded 15th Congressional District Race

By DAVID CRUZ

Councilman Ydanis Rodriguez, (right) a legislator who represents the 10th Council District in Upper Manhattan, opened a committee to enter the 15th Congressional District race. The move pits him in direct competition with fellow Council members Ritchie Torres and Rev. Ruben Diaz Sr., arguably the top two contenders in the race.

It also puts him back in competition against former New York Council Speaker Melissa Mark-Viverito and Assemblyman Michael Blake, both of whom are also running for the seat.

The move pits him in direct competition with fellow Council members Ritchie Torres and Rev. Ruben Diaz Sr., arguably the top two contenders in the race.

Rodriguez did nothing to draw attention to his candidacy, opening a campaign committee dubbed “Ydanis for Congress” with the Federal Election Commission.

Rodriguez’s candidacy likely splits the Hispanic vote that candidates such as Jonathan Ortiz, Marlene Cintron, and Mark-Viverito would try to covet as the campaign moves along. Rodriguez’s progressive ties could further divide the progressive vote among the candidates, giving Diaz Sr., the only hardline social conservative Democrat, a competitive advantage over his opponents.

When he ran for New York City Public Advocate early this year, Rodriguez secured the second-most votes next to Blake (who ultimately won the Bronx) within the 15th Congressional District, even beating Jamaane Williams, who went on to become Public Advocate.

Rodriguez is already making headlines, though not in the most flattering of ways, earning ridicule from Torres for purporting himself to be Time magazine’s 2011 Person of the Year, and mentioning it on his official Council website.

The movement was recognized by Time magazine in December 2011 as a cover story that recognized “The Protester,” with Rodriguez featured in a photo as part of the magazine’s cover story. The competition is already having a field day with his claims.

“‘In the Council Member’s defense, he is hardly the first public figure to present to be Person of the Year,’” said Torres. “[President] Donald Trump did the same several years ago. It is a Trumpian tradition.”

Torres pointed to a story of a fake Time magazine cover featuring the President, which was hung in one of his golf clubhouses.

Rodriguez was unavailable for comment as of press time.

of the Bronx for about 20 years and is eager to attend the exhibition launch on Sept. 21. “Oh absolutely, I think it’s a good idea to get a new perspective on how to define what’s today’s worth and also for young people, what’s important to you,” she said. “What is it you’re looking up to? What is it you admire? What is your role model and what is your values, you know, because we have to renew our values in a way. The younger generation have different values than we do and I think it should be a beautiful, interesting discussion.”

Devin Williams is a paralegal student at BCC and said it was important to keep a balance in terms of numbers. “I think you can’t get rid of one side because General Grant is in the Hall of Fame too – that’s the guy who was on the opposite side of the Confederate who was a Union General,” he said. “It’s like – it’s all a part of history and that’s what it’s really about. We can all have an opinion on what’s right or wrong about history but that’s just all that is here today. If they inducted two people every year, it would have to be one person from this side [each year], one person from that side. That’s it - simple.”

Williams added, “I kind of think they should keep this stuff up because it’s a part of history, you know. I just don’t see how people should be offended by, you know, people who were doing stuff that was politically correct for their time or era.”

Quadir Martin will commence his studies at BBC in January 2020. “That’s history. Keep it up and put some more new people there,” he said. “Like Rosa Parks - make it even. Put some statues of them up too - Martin Luther King, Malcolm X. Everybody get together and have a mutual discussion about it.”

Anally Hernández has just started her biology studies at BBC and says entry should be based on the impact of the candidate’s achievements, such as a person who stops a school shooter. “I think they should be in the Hall of Fame, because they risked themselves for other people and without them doing such a thing, then more people would’ve gotten hurt,” she said. “Our campus is diverse so it wouldn’t be able to equal out every aspect but even if some disagree or some agree, it’s just based on how the outcome comes out so I think, like, it’s good for everyone to vote on it.”

Reggs Gyongecaj studies biology and chemistry at BCC and was unaware of the event, but wondered whether Dr. Martin Luther King is celebrated at the hall. “I think he should be there because the majority here of the students is black. I think he should be there.”

More Legionnaires’ at Tracey Towers

The latest developments in the ongoing investigation. The first water samples were taken from the 20 building on Sept. 13 to be tested for Legionella bacteria. Results from the samples can take between two to three weeks.

Although the buildings do not have cooling towers, which are often associated with Legionnaires’ disease, the testing methods are similar. DOH inspectors collect samples from water fixtures all around the building and test them at their Public Health Laboratory. If the samples test positive for the bacteria, building management is ordered to sanitize the water system. The agency often monitors ongoing cleaning efforts and retests the water to determine if the bacteria was eradicated.

Hill urged residents to follow the DOH recommendations even if they are not yet considered mandatory. “People have come up to me and said ‘I take showers. I’m not paying any attention to that [DOH warnings],’” Hill said.

While Hill admits to fighting property management firm Ry Management over a variety of issues in the past, she acknowledged a more cooperative spirit at work in this instance.

“Management has worked hard to keep us updated. They’ve had two meetings with the Department of Health, and they’ve gone around changing the shower heads,” Hill said.

Some of the residents interpreted the installation of new shower heads at the impacted location as a sign that it was now safe to shower. The replacement of those heads was meant to reduce the spraying effect of water which is known to significantly increase the spread of the Legionella bacteria. Aerators, the attachment at the end of faucets, are also being replaced.

DOH describes these actions as “remediation steps” helping reduce the risk of spreading the waterborne bacteria while the source is still being investigated.

Daniel V. Durante, property manager at Ry Management, has kept tenants informed on a near daily basis with emails and printed announcements delivered to tenants’ front doors.

“The remediation steps we are taking are in line with [DOH] guidelines,” Durante told tenants. “We didn’t come up with these ideas. They [DOH] told us that this was the most proactive approach we could take at this early stage.”

While Durante’s email announcements are sent out consistently, it is the inefficient delivery of printed materials that has some residents concerned about who is getting the updates. For example, those tenants attending the meetings hear repeated warnings of not using hot or warm water. But, in the printed materials they also learn of the dangers of water mist, even when not warm, in spreading the disease.

One tenant who preferred not to give her name complained about the extra measures they need to take. “It’s scary [to get a notice like this] with so many people in the building. They’re telling us not to use any hot water, but we have so many elderly, we have a lot of people with children. This ain’t right,” she said.

To ensure all residents receive timely updates, regardless of whether they have an email account, the tenants association is seeking volunteers to become so-called floor captains who will knock on doors to make sure all the tenants are updated with the latest news on health issues at the apartment complex.

By the end of the tenants’ meeting, 13 people had volunteered to help check in on homebound and elderly residents who are deemed the most vulnerable in getting sick.

One tenant, who preferred not to give their name, saw the volunteering spirit as a positive first step. “This is good, but we need more. We have more than 800 apartments [within the two buildings] and we’re going to need a lot more people to cooperate,” they said.

At the first meeting with DOH at Tracey Towers, Ricky Wong, director of Community Affairs with DOH, cautioned tenants about reaching conclusions before the water there is tested. “There’s a potential that people may have been exposed elsewhere. People are transient, which means people go everywhere,” Wong said. “You go to work, you go to your community center, you go downtown to visit your cousin on the Lower East Side.”

Many of the residents attending these meetings have expressed a desire to know the identity and updated condition of those who have been infected. New York state privacy laws bar the disclosure of patient information, continuing tenants’ guessing game of who’s infected.

With so much uncertainty revolving around which tenants have been infected, the source of the bacteria, and, ultimately, how many tenants will cooperate with the safety measures, Hill maintains that more information is key to keeping residents calm.

“I know many of you are anxious,” Hill told tenants. “But you must read the flyers that the Department of Health and management keep giving us. You cannot put your [head] in the sand and pretend like it’s not happening.”

DOH recommends people with health issues such as chronic lung disease, a weakened immune system, or if aged 50 and over, immediately seek medical attention if they develop a fever, chills, muscle aches and cough.

Editor’s Note: If tenants have any further concerns, they can call the DOH Community Affairs Unit at (347) 396-4161.

One tenant who preferred not to give her name complained about the extra measures they need to take. “It’s scary [to get a notice like this] with so many people in the building. They’re telling us not to use any hot water, but we have so many elderly, we have a lot of people with children. This ain’t right,” she said.

To ensure all residents receive timely updates, regardless of whether they have an email account, the tenants association is seeking volunteers to become so-called floor captains who will knock on doors to make sure all the tenants are updated with the latest news on health issues at the apartment complex.

By the end of the tenants’ meeting, 13 people had volunteered to help check in on homebound and elderly residents who are deemed the most vulnerable in getting sick.

One tenant, who preferred not to give their name, saw the volunteering spirit as a positive first step. “This is good, but we need more. We have more than 800 apartments [within the two buildings] and we’re going to need a lot more people to cooperate,” they said.

At the first meeting with DOH at Tracey Towers, Ricky Wong, director of Community Affairs with DOH, cautioned tenants about reaching conclusions before the water there is tested. “There’s a potential that people may have been exposed elsewhere. People are transient, which means people go everywhere,” Wong said. “You go to work, you go to your community center, you go downtown to visit your cousin on the Lower East Side.”

Many of the residents attending these meetings have expressed a desire to know the identity and updated condition of those who have been infected. New York state privacy laws bar the disclosure of patient information, continuing tenants’ guessing game of who’s infected.

With so much uncertainty revolving around which tenants have been infected, the source of the bacteria, and, ultimately, how many tenants will cooperate with the safety measures, Hill maintains that more information is key to keeping residents calm.

“I know many of you are anxious,” Hill told tenants. “But you must read the flyers that the Department of Health and management keep giving us. You cannot put your [head] in the sand and pretend like it’s not happening.”

DOH recommends people with health issues such as chronic lung disease, a weakened immune system, or if aged 50 and over, immediately seek medical attention if they develop a fever, chills, muscle aches and cough.
